

Vision of the project

The project aimed to create an audiovisual work documenting the journey of volunteers from the village of Babyn (Kosiv district, Ivano-Frankivsk region) to their fellow villagers who had been serving on the frontline in Bakhmut (Donetsk region) and Huliaypol (Zaporizhzhia region) for over a year. Screenings and discussions were planned to take place in Babyn, Ivano-Frankivsk, Zaporizhzhia, Kyiv, and online.

The audiovisual work documented not only how villages in western and eastern Ukraine lived during the war but also explored the rich cultural elements of music, dialect, architecture, plants, and visual patterns unique to different regions of the country.

The project focused on three central figures: a village elder who was rescuing the wounded from the battlefield near Bakhmut, a veterinarian who became a military medic in just four days and served for over a year and a half on the frontline, and a village priest who took on the role of chaplain. These individuals were defending the country under such dangerous conditions that they were often prohibited from using mobile phones. Meanwhile, life in their villages continued without them, creating a risk of not only geographical distance but also a mental and emotional divide between those on the frontline and those who remained at home. Volunteers served as a vital connection between these groups, maintaining human ties and ensuring communication.

This project captured an extraordinary moment in Ukraine's history, illustrating the unique role of volunteers in bridging the gap between regions and fostering connections across more than a thousand kilometres. It emphasised the importance of communication, mutual understanding, and forming an environmentally conscious attitude towards the country's shared environment. The audiovisual work highlighted the interconnectedness of communities and the resilience of the human spirit during a time of war.
